answer his calls, he knew each one and often would have some of them on his shoulders while he conversed with them. (This was something else hermarked about the day we reminisced, he could no longer whistle per our berries picked and Grandma Holbrook had a big poor of blackberry dumplings ready in no time. The real teat of those dumplings was the dip she served over them. Her dip was something special to us. The spring treat of those dumplings was the dip was she served over them. Her dip was something special to us. The spring close by had kept a bucket of milk cold, and when she powerd a portion of it in a big bloe picher and added a mite of sugar, dash of some magic pick, stirred it with a big wooden spick, stirred it with a big wooden dumplings made from freship picked better is it was at real worth remembering. That was the last time either of us visited with Grandma in her own home. She finished her last days with my Mom and Dad.

If Ish hadn't picked these memories from the ashes of the past I may not have found them on my own. That is one more reason I miss him. He has taken an important part off me with him, "The memories only he and I shared."
