"Coach House"

named Lloyd Jennings who killed Smith. Jennings was a newly wed and was supposedly caring for the house with Thaddeus Drew, then the owner, was away.

Other assorted legends, maybe true, maybe not, have sprung up around the house. Some say that Ulysses S. Grant stopped at the coach house while heading south with his troops. Some say that the ghost of Sally Cranberry haunts the house. Mrs. Cranberry died in the coach house in 1831 during childbirth. She is however, buried less than a mile away.

Wally's youngest son, Clyde "Butch" has also had some famous people to his father's home.

Butch Phillips played in entertainer George Jones' band and Jones visited the homeplace from time to time.

However, Wally lived in the house 70 years and said he had never seen a ghost.

Whatever is or isn't true about Wally Phillips' house, the legends are good to hear. They are about our own people and are our heritage.

But if you ever go and stand for a moment in the attic of that ancient structure, you will almost visualize Tom Jim and some drivers sitting around the barrel playing cards.

Wally Phillips served as Rockcastle County Jailor and as magistrate for many years. He and his wife Belle Drew Phillips raised seven sons at their Red Hill home.

Carlos "Toad", John and "Butch" are still living.

Goy, Charles, Clint and Sherman are deceased.

Stanley Phillips said that he was simply restoring the house to the way it appeared as a coach house - in an effort to preserve one of Rockcastle's most historical sites.

No one will live at the coach house, especially not Stanley, who believes the stories about the house being haunted.

Stanley is building a new home across the road in Jackson County. He purchased the farm and house from the heirs of Wally Phillips. Editor's Note: Much of the information in preceding story was taken from a story written by Roger Goldstein for the Signal in the 70s.

The original banister leading to the upstairs of the former coach house still stands.

The original Roman numeral markings can still be seen on some of the ceiling beams in the former coach house at Red Hill.
